Abstract

Meditation has a metaphysical impact on human brain functioning. It is of utmost required to infer the cognitive effects of meditation using an electroencephalogram (EEG). In this novel work, the analyses of EEG signals' features are extracted for cognitive effects on a human brain for meditation intervention of 25 subjects. To analyze the meditation effects, this study examines the feasibility of statistical, spatial, spectral, coherence features, and time–frequency analysis of EEG signals for control and meditator group. Based on the effective features the various classifiers are used to compare the accuracy and distinguish a subject as control or meditator. The results demonstrate that the Support Vector Machine (SVM) gives better accuracy than Artificial Neural Network (ANN) and k-Nearest Neighbors (KNN). The statistical analysis shows that the Variance and Sample Entropy decreased in meditators whereas, in spatial analysis, the Mahalanobis distance increased. The spectral analysis stated that theta power has increased 88% of subjects whereas the alpha power is increased for the entire subjects after meditation. The coherence observed in the pre-frontal lobes' electrode pair is more in the meditators than in the control group. Eventually, meditation improves relaxation, cognitive functions, calmness, and mental concentration.

Relaxation, confidence, and cognition are the main factors for refining the efficiency of human beings productivity. Basically, meditation is an activity that supports to enhance the understanding of self-realization. In current days scenario, the psychological stress arises due to decrescent workload, tends to insomnia, negativity or negative emotions, depression, life spoiling diseases, and many other symptoms for an extended period.

In many instances, the pathophysiological complication of disease arises from stress. Chronic or continued stress has a significant effect on the immune system that ultimately manifests illness and leads to vitamin deficiencies, ulcers, cancers, etc. [1, 2]. Previous studies scrutinized that meditation can remarkably affect physical as well as mental health and discovered the meditation effect on mental relaxation and disease diminishes [3]. It also helps to maintain homeostasis in the body. It is a technique for enhancing immune response, positive emotions, cognitive function, and lowering levels of stress, depression, insomnia, and anxiety [4]. The EEG is a temporal technique that records and monitor the electrical activity of human brain cerebrum. Due to the synchronized activity of neurons with similar spatial orientation the EEG activity produces oscillations at different types of frequencies [5]. This technique used to analyze the effects of meditation. The EEG signal analysis is frequently grouped in frequency bands: delta, theta, alpha, beta, and gamma.

Meditation produces changes in certain frequency bands. To identify the difference between before and after meditations' signals. Hence in order to analyze the meditation effects, first time this study examines the feasibility of statistical, spatial, time–frequency analysis, spectral, and coherence features analysis of EEG signals for before and after a month of meditation intervention.

1.1 Related work

In concern with the EEG signals, some work has been done to find the significant changes between the EEG signals and the mental states. EEG studies have been used to mention the brainwave changes that arise during meditating [6]. Lagopoulos et al. observed the changes of theta and alpha bands in non-directive meditation techniques as compare to regular relaxation [7]. Dillbeck et al. found significant changes in frontal alpha coherence in TM practice [8]. Whereas the meditative changes in concern with EEG signals have not yet been firmly established [9]. Ahani et al. proposed methods to analyze the changes of EEG and respiration signals for meditation and control state [10]. Mingqian et al. carried out the experiment to investigate the insight of mindfulness meditation [11].

Further, to detect the calmness and meditative condition EEG signal analyzed [12]. Chandana et al. demonstrated a method to compare the EEG of different level of meditators [13]. Traisak et al. observed the effects of EEG using binaural-beat-based technique [14]. Jadhav et al. illustrated the consequences of meditation on emotional response through Hjorth parameters and functional connectivity [15]. The regular meditation and yoga practice can affect the positive impact on brain areas especially, on frontal and parietal areas mentioned in [16, 17].

Gaurav G. et al. recited that theta; alpha and beta are higher in the frontal and central regions [18]. Frederick Travis narrated the importance of narrow frequency bands that reflects the different cognitive process [19]. Kora et al. elaborated the different meditation styles on Brain waves concerning physical and mental health [20]. To find the significant changes in relation to mental state and EEG signals have been explored, but there remains a lack of a classification of these signals during the state of rest and meditation [21]. Damodar et al. put forward a method to classify the human mental state using Random Forest Classifier [22]. Ingle et al. suggested different classification methods to classify the EEG signals during controlled and meditation states [23]. Sharma et al. achieved 87.2% accuracy for identification of the meditators and non-meditators [24].

In order to analyze the cognitive effects of meditation, there is a need for quantitative and qualitative analysis of EEG signals. Here the novelty is that the analysis is done using statistical, spatial, spectral, coherence are the multi-features. The classification is done by choosing effective features which are applying to ANN, KNN, and SVM classifiers for before and after a month of meditation. The promising results are obtained through quantitative and qualitative analyses.

This paper is organized as Sect. 2 for methods and material used in the EEG recording system and experimental protocol details. The Sect. 3 narrates various feature extraction and details of each. The statistical, spatial, spectral, coherence analysis and classification are given in Sect. 4. The results with discussions are presented in Sect. 5. Finally, Sect. 6 presents the conclusion of the work done.

2 Methods and material

In this study, the 'Medicaid Neuro-Compact 2400' system is used to acquire EEG signals from different subjects using Ag–Cl types of electrodes for analyzing the impact of meditation. There is a 10–20 international system with total 21 electrodes for data acquisitions. The sampling frequency (F_s) is observed as 114 Hz. The EEG samples of 25 novice healthy subjects between the age group of 16–50 years including male and female genders are used for the analysis and classification of EEG.

The EEG signal recording is done before meditation and after a month of meditation intervention for the same 25 subjects. Before meditation, the EEG data recorded when the subjects are in a calm and relaxed state with their mind stable for 10 min. The same subjects have performed meditation continuously for a minimum 20–30 min daily for a month. After a month of meditation, the EEG of meditators was recorded for 5–7 min.

The prefrontal cortex is majorly responsible for the cognitive process [11]. Thus, for analysis of the cognitive effects of meditation only the frontal lobe electrodes (F3, F4, F7, F8, FP1, FP2, Fz) are used. Each epoch has a total of 912 samples. The EEG signals are sampled at 114 Hz over 8 s time duration. All the datasets are processed by designing every step. The implementation is done by programming for features extraction, analysis, and classifications through the MATLAB (R2020a) 9.8.0.1323502 platform. The ethical clearance is acquired from the Government Medical College Akola, Maharashtra, India.

In this research work, the various subjects' brain activity or physiological EEG signals are recorded for the analysis of features before and after a month of meditation intervention. The proposed methodology is demonstrated in Fig. 1. The experimentation process is starting by designing and utilizing a finite impulse response (FIR) filter for the separation of EEG bands as per frequency bands. Further to extract the various features of the EEG bands. The statistical, spatial, spectral, and coherence analyses are performed by extracting Variance, Sample Entropy, Mahalanobis distance, Power spectral density, and Coherence multi-features before and after meditation.

The student t-test is performed to examine the discrimination of control and meditators group. The p -values estimated from the t-test show how better these data discriminate between both classes. In binary classification, student t-test aid in the evaluation of whether or not a particular feature in both classes is significantly different. Eventually, the effective features are used to classify meditators and non-meditators. The classification is performed using ANN, KNN, and SVM based on effective features. Finally, the results are presented in the form of receiver operating characteristics (ROC) and reclamation of meditators.

2.1 Feature extraction

The feature demonstrates a differential property, a recognizable measurement, and a functional component obtained from a section of a pattern. Extracted features are meant to minimize the loss of important information embedded in the signal [25]. The various bands of EEG signals are extracted by designing and implementing FIR filter. The FIR bandpass filter is designed after averaging all frontal lobe electrodes for both datasets of each subject. This filter is processed by assigning the minimum attenuation level value '0.001' as band attenuation. The passband ripple is fluctuations in the frequency magnitude response within the passband of the filter and the value is set as '1' which is constant across their passbands. The density factor is assigned as '20' which controls the frequencies grid to evaluate the frequency response.

The EEG data of each subject processed using bandpass filter in 1 to 30 Hz which allows separating different rhythms such as delta (0.5–4 Hz), theta (4–8 Hz), alpha (8–12 Hz), beta (12–30 Hz).

All features are evaluated at the frontal electrodes for various bands, including delta, theta, alpha, and beta. The gamma is excluded in the study because of its hyperactivity in nature. For classification and differentiation between control and meditators the Variance, Sample Entropy, Mahalanobis distance, Power spectral density, and Coherence multi-features are utilized. These features are extracted band-wise for both control and meditators group with frontal lobe channels of EEG time series.

3 Details for various features

The equations for computation of each of the features are demonstrated as below:

3.1 Variance (Var.)

The variance measures the variability of electrodes' potential from the mean value of amplitude of EEG in 8 s [26].

3.2 Sample entropy (S-En)

The Sample Entropy measures the randomness of a time series. A high random brain indicates creativity or anxiety. These entropy estimators are useful in obtaining the nonlinear interrelations and complexity of brain regions. Entropy indicates the average amount of surprisal in the information processing system that underlying its feasible outcomes [27].

It is a measure of information as the measure of uncertainty that scrutinized the complexity in data of time series. It is also a measure of variability of EEG time series regarding its regularity in data sequence and reveals a high entropy value for more irregularity in data sequence. The S-En is less affected by the presence of noise and can be estimated for small length data of time series and even resistant to spikes. These phenomena make S-En an analytical tool for non-linear signal analysis of brain waves [28], as given in (1).

where $B^m(r)$ = Probability that two vectors will match for 'm' samples, $A^m(r)$ = Probability that two vectors will match for $m + 1$ samples, time series with N samples, length of compared window m , and tolerance r .

3.3 Mahalanobis distance (MD)

Mahalanobis distance is the distance between a point and a distribution. It is not a distance between two distinct points; it is effectively a multivariate equivalent of the Euclidean distance. The Mahalanobis distance is introduced to overcome the problems of Euclidean distance. The Mahalanobis distance is commonly used in discriminant analysis and in testing for outliers [29]. The point has a greater Mahalanobis distance from the rest of the sample population of points that implies more leverage. The MD is evaluated as given in (2).

$$D^2 = (x - m)^T \times C^{-1} \times (x - m) \quad (2)$$

D^2 : The square of the Mahalanobis distance; x : The vector of the observation (row in a dataset); m : The vector of mean values of independent variables (Average of each column);

C^{-1} : The inverse covariance matrix of independent variables.

3.4 Power spectral density (PSD)

The spectral analysis will illustrate the activity of brain over different regions and different states, which reflect the general arousal levels of brain. Power spectral density represents the power distribution of EEG series per unit frequency.

PSD estimation is a non-parametric method utilized to calculate the power spectrum of EEG time series as a function of frequency while maintaining the balance between smoothing in time and frequency resolution.

3.5 Coherence

Coherence represents the normalized covariance of two time series in the frequency domain. The magnitude-squared coherence estimate is a function of frequency with values between 0 and 1. These values indicate how well 'x' corresponds to 'y' at each frequency component. The magnitude-squared coherence is a function of the power spectral densities. The coherence function $C_{xy}(f)$ at frequency f for signal 'x' and 'y' is obtained by the normalization of cross-spectral spectrum [30] as mentioned in (3).

$$C_{xy}(f) = \frac{|P_{xy}(f)|^2}{P_{xx}(f) * P_{yy}(f)} \quad (3)$$

where $P_{xx}(f)$ and $P_{yy}(f)$ are the function of the power spectral densities of 'x' and 'y' respectively. $P_{xy}(f)$ = Cross power spectral density of x and y. Coherence is used for the estimation of functional connectivity. It is based on spectral analysis, which describes the synchronization of the brains' electric activities of different frequencies between different brain areas.

4 Artificial neural network (ANN)

ANNs are nonlinear mapping structure. ANNs can recognize correlated patterns between the input data set and respective assigned target values. It is expected as a conversant classifier due to its inbuilt characteristics like robustness, self-organization, generalization capability, and adaptive learning [31]. In this research work, the classification is done by using the feed-forward back-propagation neural network. The nature of the EEG signal is non-stationary. Each subjects' EEG signal was segmented into 8 s epoch (912 samples). The threshold values are set after averaging the results obtained by EEG bands from extracted features. Then these features are fed as input to the ANN classifier for testing and training of the proposed methodology.

The data are divided into two classes: pre-meditation and post-meditation. It classifies the EEG signal under testing which will be compared according to the assigned target as control or meditator group. The network is trained using a back-propagation algorithm. The algorithm generates a function that maps the input into the desired output.

4.1 k-Nearest neighbor (KNN)

KNN is a simple classifier that uses a non-parametric method for classification. It classifies data according to the majority of its neighbors defined by positive integer K. This classifier gives better accuracy on the training data set, due to the position of training samples and their classes are constant throughout the classification process [32].

Here, the classification is done by using Euclidean distance metric d with the nearest neighbor $K = 3$. The Euclidean distance metric is intelligible and easy to implement a method for reckoning distances in multidimensional input space. The effective features from averaged values of four bands are assigned with labels for training of the KKN with metric 'd' with the nearest neighbor $k = 3$ Then it classifies the data point into a particular class using number of the nearest neighbors.

4.2 Support vector machine (SVM)

SVM is the supervised learning method used for data classification. The SVM has good accuracy along with generalization capabilities. It also has a better ability to deal with a large number of predictors [33]. It utilized a machine-learning algorithm to increase predictive accuracy while automatically avoiding over-fit to the data [34]. For separating data between two groups SVM is used to construct the optimal hyperplane.

Here the classification is done using SVM along with Radial basis function (RBF) kernel. After, hypothesized selected features are used for training with assigned labels for meditators and controls. An optimal boundary for corresponding output is found using RBF kernel [21].

5 Results and discussion

5.1 Statistical and spatial analysis

As per the proposed methodology, the analysis of each of the subjects' EEG signals is done before and after meditation. The study estimates the statistical and spatial analysis after averaging the seven frontal channels of EEG data. Here it is demonstrated the features such as Variance, Sample Entropy, and Mahalanobis distance. Table 1, shows the averaged values of statistical features for all 25 subjects. It is inferred that; the variance is decreased after meditation in all the respective bands of all 25 subjects.

As the variability of electrodes' potential becomes lower than its mean value when the subject gets relaxed. The average sample entropy value for average of theta and alpha band is decreased in meditators whereas in delta and beta bands it is increased after a month of meditation intervention. The theta and alpha bands' sample entropy is low for meditators as compared to the control group.

Student t-test is utilized to supervise the significant difference between the control and meditators group EEG data. The student t-test is the hypothesis that 'there is no difference in average of two data sets [28]. A comparison of two data sets using student t-test gives a probability (p -value) of hypothesis is correct. The p -value indicates probability that the hypothesis is true and two data sets are same. A threshold value is chosen for the significance level.

Generally, 5% and 1% is significance level to be chosen. It is stated that if the p -value is equal to or less than the significance level, it shows that there is higher discrimination between two data sets. The p -value is evaluated from student t-test for different bands with < 0.05 as a significant level. Figure 2 shows the p -values for different features between control group and meditators group. It demonstrates that all bands' p -value < 0.05 for Variance, Mahalanobis distance, Sample Entropy, Power, and Coherence as shown in Fig. 2.

Meditation produces changes in certain frequency bands. Delta activity related to deep sleep and also appeared in deep meditation. Theta activity is associated with alertness, attention, cognitive, working memory, and the frontal theta activity indicative of concentration. Hence increase in theta activity reflects the increase in processing and awareness. The frontal lobe of the brain is responsible for cognitive activities such as problem-solving, attention interactions with other brain parts, which are also sensitive to intensive or continuous stress. A changed pattern of frontal functioning might be expected in subjects reporting a greater sense of self during activity.

The statistical analysis reveals that variance is higher in the control group than in the meditators group as observed in Table 1. From this, it is inferred that it reduces too much stress and anxiety. A high random brain indicates creativity or anxiety. Sample entropy is decreased in theta and alpha bands for the meditators group, unlike the control group. Hence, decreased sample entropy indicates decrease in randomness and increase in non-linearity of EEG signals. As the nonlinearity increases, brain cognitive functions perform better.

For the spatial analysis, the average Mahalanobis distance is observed higher in meditator than control group. Eventually, it means the subjects are calmed after meditation in comparison to the brain activities recorded before meditation. As resulted the p -values are lower having higher discriminating data set between the control and meditators group for Variance and Mahalanobis distance.

5.1.1 Spectral analysis

The purpose of this work is to estimate the effects on human being brain after the meditation. This is done by examining the different brain rhythms. One of the significant methods used to investigate the spectral feature is to explore the EEG signals' spectral characteristics rhythm-wise. The Spectral analysis produces information regarding the existence of different frequency bands of EEG that reverberates the general arousal levels of the brain [34]. There are certain major rhythms in the brain as reflected through spectral analysis of EEG. Many EEG activities have rhythmical nature illustrates the requisite for spectral analysis.

The spectral analysis is carried out with FFT decomposition and demonstrated the activity of brain over the frontal lobe regions only and different states (Supplementary Fig. 3). The powerspectral density is evaluated using FFT which is more useful to analyze the EEG signals [35]. The state changes occur after meditation due to changes in variable neuronal activity, particularly measured as changes in neuronal speed and power [36]. Hence, the electrical activity

Table 1 Variance, Sample entropy (S-En), Mahalanobis distance, Power features for before (control group) and after a month of meditation intervention (meditators group)

	EEG bands: Control Group				EEG bands: Meditators Group
	Delta	Theta	Alpha	Beta	Delta	Theta	Alpha	Beta
Var	5.14	0.77	0.42	0.32	2.07	0.50	0.28	0.25
S-EN	0.23	0.48	0.49	0.68	0.24	0.46	0.48	0.69
MD	0.35	1.89	3.38	7.49	0.57	2.22	6.06	15.35
Power	333.0	36.3	1.77	11.03	235.6	55.12	18.44	10.15

emerged from the brain which is exhibited in the form of brainwaves. The maximum power value is extracted from the maximum amplitudes of the EEG signals shown in Table 1.

It is observed that there is an overall increase in power after a month of meditation, in theta and alpha bands compared with the control group. While delta and beta band power decreases. Increased power in the alpha band implies high activity while doing easy tasks and theta band indicates subject alert to the external environment [11]. Whereas the delta band and beta band power are decreased in the corresponding subject. From the analysis, theta and alpha bands are stronger with respect to band power in meditators than the control group which implies that theta and alpha changes appear from meditation practice. The increases in alpha and theta band power and decrease in frequency correlates with the lower level of anxiety and a higher level of calmness [3]. The alpha and theta band shows that $p < 0.05$ while delta and beta bands > 0.05 indicate $p > 0.05$. From the observation of p -value, it is implied that the theta band has a lower p -value while alpha band has higher discriminating data set between the control group and the meditators group as shown in Fig. 2.

Through the power spectral analysis, it is perceived that power in theta and alpha bands increases significantly which supports and signifies the previous studies conducted on meditation. It is stated that, after meditation, there is a considerable increase in theta power for 88% subjects and an increase in alpha power for all the subjects. Whereas the delta and beta bands power are decreased. Theta band is associated with alertness, attention, working memory, and increased awareness of surrounding. Strong theta power spectrum indicates high activity anterior cingulate cortex and hippocampus; both areas link with autonomic nervous system. Increased power also occurs in alpha band associated with relaxation which is found in meditators. This band is stronger in meditators than control, which implies the state and traits alpha changes emerge from meditation practice. Hence, increased alpha power after meditation revealed a lower level of anxiety and a higher level of calmness. Thus, meditation augment the cognitive function and stimulates the mental concentration as evidence by increased in alpha and theta power in a frontal lobe.

5.2 Coherence analysis

The magnitude-squared coherence is calculated using Eq. (2). Coherence estimation is a measure of variability of phase between two EEG time series that quantifies the synchrony property [30]. The estimated coherence ranges from 0 to 1, where 0 indicates that the corresponding frequency components of two signals are linearly independent; while 1 indicates that both signals give the maximum linear correlation. The coherence analysis of the EEG used to examine the coupling between cortical regions and evaluate functional interactions between neural systems operating in each frequency band. The cortex of brain consists of two halves, the left and right hemisphere. The EEG electrode placement is done on the scalp by using 10–20 international system. The 10–20 system is based on the relationship between the location of an electrode and the underlying area of cerebral cortex. The cortex of brain consists of two halves, the left and right hemisphere. In this research work, the coherence is demonstrated between two electrodes of left and right hemisphere (interhemispheric connectivity) for different bands with only frontal lobe electrode pairs such as F3–F4, F7–F8, and FP1–FP2 respectively.

The synchronization of logical with intuitive functions of the brain exemplars a good coherence between two hemispheres [37]. The coherence analysis for the control and meditators group is shown in [Online Appendix Table 2]. This indicates the higher coherence for delta, theta, and alpha bands. It is reduced for beta band in meditators. [Online Appendix Table 2] shows quantitative and qualitative analysis with subjects' reclamation after a month of meditation intervention. The left hemisphere is responsible for controlling the right side of the body; it also performs logical thinking, speech, analysis, and sense of time. On the other hand, the right hemisphere coordinates with the left side of the body. It has ability to recognize faces and comprehend maps and intuitive functions. It is observed from the coherence feature that the frontal lobe electrode pair (F3–F4) has more coherence in the meditators group compared to other electrode pairs. Higher the coherence between electrodes, higher will be the connectivity, cooperation and more information will transmit between the underlying brain regions.

The higher coherence is the higher synchrony, which indicates a strong functional coupling between the brain hemisphere areas of interest. Hence it is increased the neural information exchange, functional coordination, and integrity of cortical neural pathways in physiology [37]. The quantitative and qualitative results inferred that meditation helps to hold attention to the desired purpose. It is justified from the observation that brain hemisphere connectivity is increased and it regulates emotions.

5.3 Classification

The classification of subjects for before and after meditation is performed using different classifiers such as ANN, KNN, and SVM. As per feature selection decision, the Variance and Mahalanobis distance are selected for classification. For balancing training set, the threshold values are set after averaging the obtained result of four bands from extracted features. These values were fed as input to the classifiers for testing and training. The data is divided into two classes: before meditation and after a month of meditation intervention. For the training purpose dataset of both features each of total 30 inputs obtained from 15 subjects. Two distinct classes are used for 10 subjects' EEG data for testing each before and after a month of meditation intervention.

Receiver operating characteristic (ROC) analysis is a process for to evaluate, compare, and select classifiers according to their performance [38]. This is an emphatic technique for estimating the performance of a classifier. ROC curve narrates the trade-off between the sensitivity and (1 - Specificity). ROC curve is a graphical display (not given due to space problem) for varying cut-off points of test values and sensitivity or true positive rate (TPR) on the x-axis and (1 - specificity) or FPR on the y-axis.

The classification model performance of these classifiers is measured using the area under the ROC curve (AUC). The value of AUC ranges from 0 to 1 and when it is closer to 1, it indicates better performance of the test. The AUC is calculated by trapezoidal rule. The ROC curves of three different classifiers are created with the same training data set. The ANN classifier gives $AUC = 0$, eventually, the performance of ANN is very low. Whereas, KNN classifier indicates the $AUC = 0.9678$ and the SVM classifier gives $AUC = 0.9867$. From these results, the highest AUC is achieved through SVM classifier and hence, SVM classifier performs better than the KNN and ANN on training data set.

ROC parameters used to estimate the performance of the proposed methodology are Specificity (Se), Sensitivity (Sn), and Accuracy (Acc) [37]. Sensitivity measures the proportion of actual positives that are correctly identified. Specificity measures proportion of actual negatives that are correctly identified. Accuracy indicates the number of correct decisions done by the classifier. True positive (TP) indicates the meditators group which are correctly identified as 'meditators' and True negative (TN) indicates the control group which is correctly identified as 'control' by the classifier. False-positive (FP) is the number of meditators which are incorrectly classified as control and false-negative (FN) is the number of control group which is incorrectly classified as meditators.

Table 2 shows the results of classification using proposed method for meditators and control EEG signals. The comparative performance of the SVM classifier shows the highest accuracy than ANN and KNN.

6 Conclusion

The objective of this innovative work is to analyze the cognitive effects on pre and post-meditation. To investigate the meditation effects on human brain signals, there is a need to enucleate the physiological signals. It seems to be a novel approach which is done first time as the combined analysis of the Statistical, Spatial, Spectral, and Coherence analysis of EEG signals for pre and post-meditation conditions.

From the quantitative and qualitative analysis, it is stated that meditation improves cognitive function and increases the mental concentration as well as functional connectivity of the brain. Thus, meditation helps to refining the efficiency of human beings' productivity. The classification of subjects for before and after meditation is performed through ANN, KNN, and SVM. From the observations of ROC parameters, it is stated that SVM gives (85%) better accuracy than ANN (72.5%) and KNN (82.5%). If the numbers of subjects are more, it makes classifier highly intelligible and strong for the training. Eventually, it will improve the testing performance.

Under the qualitative analysis, the methodology gives 100% results in terms of meditators reclamations. In the future, the work will be expanded with permutations and combinations of different age groups and gender of the subjects, meditation intervention with various type of meditation such as mindfulness meditation, transcendental meditation, etc. Also, study will be scaled to examine the effects of meditation on psychophysiological parameters.

Abstract

Lean manufacturing is the concept that is driving the industry to cut losses and maximize profits which have big effect on the manufacturing industry where tool life and quality of operation are of utmost importance. Tool life as well as quality of operation can control by controlling various parameters among which lubrication is an important one. Drilling of titanium-based alloys such as Ti6Al4V has a challenge of rapid wear of drilling tool which reduces tool life and also the quality of the drill. Proper lubrication, if used, can reduce wear of
